

Archive » General News » News

Riding the Elephant (Lake Road) with Sheila Davis

July 15, 2015

By Sara Gottardi

On the evening of Friday, July 10, the Art Gallery of Bancroft (AGB) had the chance to meet and digest the wonderfully worldly colourful and intimate landscape works of artist Sheila Davis. Oil paintings filled the evening and walls with a sense of being in the wilderness in an eloquent manner as Davis' paintings are focused and based upon profound connections, emotions and a spiritual sense of perceptions of places she has visited. Becoming enamored with certain nooks in places like forests in Canada, Davis loves the rugged and untamed quality they hold for her work as well as for her working environment as a creative person. Having traveled through Europe and despite being taken by its beauty, she still revealed that Canada's beauty is by far the most cherished and favored place to be within and travel for her.

Sharing with other's the beautiful places she sees, places like "Canada's forests, the tangled underbrush and undisturbed," is where she feels most at home and able to interpret what she feels as opposed to what she sees around herself. In her own manner of accumulating information, there is an order in herself to truly absorb what she feels and not only to pay attention to the outer sensations but to the inner as well. Davis enjoys the places "where people have yet to interfere with," she'd stated.

Working from her own photos to kick-off her creative juices flowing, enabling her to pinpoint areas of intrigue and to draw her audience's attention into a more deep and meaningful sense her paintings convey. Transferring an "ordinary scene and cutting into it to find the light and texture I'm looking for," Davis said, is something instinctual, integral and happens often without trying. With a strong grasp of who she is and who she's becoming still both internally and externally coalesces within her works as her paintings bring feelings and emotions through what the earth is telling her, feeding her. Each point of view of every landscape is never to be taken point blank but to be felt and looked at for deeper meanings and correlations to the self and to Mother Earth instead of taking things solely at face value.

"Before I start a piece of work, I ask myself; what is the image saying and what does it want me to say. Every landscape, scene or picture has a voice and it's up to us to translate that," Davis said. Although primarily self-taught in her craft, Davis still will often paint with friends from The East Central Ontario Art Association as they feed off one another and are good influences equally she says without haste, there is no harsh judgments but optimistic views. Funnily enough, Davis admits that, "I don't think people know that I am as spiritual as I am. It's a strong influence in my work but I can come across as quite cynical," she said.

When Davis was a little girl she'd use to sew but nobody in the family was any sort of enthused by the arts culture severely. This, ultimately led her to discover things more on her own rather than with others or in being shown different artists, art styles and archetypes at a young age. There is only so much schooling and preparation you can take before you need to step into your own and become acquainted with the field you so aspire to be a part of Davis reprimanded and "as my work has developed I've had different influences," people like Kathleen Artthrowl and Turner to name a few are some of Davis' additional influences. Also to be noted are artists such as: Brian Atyeo, Drew Klassen, Blu Smith and Erin Hanson who she absolutely adores and looks to continuously recently becoming more indulgent in the abstract side of art, Davis said.

After every session of working on a painting, Davis mentioned she cleans her palette completely. This is so to start fresh and new for her next sessions. Rich in colours and undefined definition of natures beauty, Davis said, "I started in water colour - size was limiting and glass was a barrier. I did acrylic, but it's plastic and feels artificial. Oil has life, it has an essence that lends itself to discovery. It is consistent in its texture and colour," she also mentioned that she isn't "a detail oriented person," stating, "I see energy and movement in space. Not stagnant details." Usually Davis will "rough in" the image" playing with oil sticks and scribbling loop like figures to loosen and open up her space before giving them real movement when she goes in for a second or third session. The second and third days she'll go in with heavier paints to help define previous light strokes or places of interest. Picking out highlights and areas that catch the eye, like small shocking instances in paintings or pictures that automatically capture the attention of a passerby.

For more information visit Sheila Davis' website at: www.sheiladavis.ca.

Letters to the Editor

- ▶ Masking freedom and liberty
- ▶ Food security within our reach
- ▶ The great submission
- ▶ Seniors' homes a mess
- ▶ Three books that left a lasting impression
- ▶ Being 'right with God' is not enough
- ▶ Worry about getting right with God, not climate change
- ▶ Homelessness in North Hastings and Housing First
- ▶ Injustice or disorder?
- ▶ Still time to stand up against Faraday quarry

Headline News

South Algonquin debates modifying its Strategic Plan

Nov. 12, 2020 By Mike Riley South Algonquin Township council discussed its strategic plan during their council meeting on Nov. 4. Their current plan was ...

Food programs mean no one should go hungry

Nov. 11, 2020 By Chris Drost After last year, so joyfully taking over the coordination of the annual Christmas Eve Community Dinner held at the ...

Local family featured in CBC documentary

Nov. 4, 2020 By Chris Drost A local mother and her three children are one of five families featured in a new Markham Street Films ...

Wollaston's Mayor Shaw abruptly resigns

Nov. 4, 2020 By Nate Smelle Monday morning, residents of Wollaston Township learned that Mayor Barbara Shaw had decided to leave her position on council ...

COVID-19 will affect 2020 hunting season

Oct. 28, 2020 By Kristena Schutt-Moore Safety is always on the mind of those out in the fields during hunting season. But this year there ...

Big changes at Moose FM in Bancroft

Oct. 28, 2020 By Chris Drost There are changes afoot at Bancroft's Moose FM radio station. Vista Radio Ltd. has begun a consolidation process that ...

Help for homeless in Hastings-Lennox and Addington on its way

Oct. 28, 2020 By Nate Smelle Throughout the COVID-19 pandemic in Ontario, so far the province's homeless population have been among the hardest hit. In ...

Eco School inspires kids in South Algonquin

Oct. 22, 2020 By Mike Riley Local Journalism Initiative Reporter The Eco Schools program is a great worldwide initiative that teaches kids more about nature ...

Global Handwashing Day more relevant this year

Oct. 22, 2020 By Mike Riley Local Journalism Initiative Reporter Oct. 15 was Global Handwashing Day and its message of "Hand Hygiene for All" was ...